Kelvin climbed over a fence and was immediately startled, because he could not see very far ahead. Up the field, the mist was quite thick. But he was familiar with this first mile (21) or so. He adjusted the length of his bag's strap, and set off over the long grass. The wet (22) grass, moistened by the morning's dew, brushed against his legs and made his jeans damp very quickly. The path was perilous too, so he had to watch his footing. Down in the grass, (23) the dandelions shone like gold.

Read the passage below and answer questions 26 to 30.

After tying the family's two dogs to the vehicle, Jeff and Ruth set up their chairs. Their children hurried to the sea with their surfboards. Their view of them was blocked by the breakwaters but the couple was reassured as Ann's squeals of delight rang through the sweltering air.

Ann and her brother, Sam, were just a metre apart and in waist-high water when Sam suddenly felt a pain as though his left ankle and knee were being stabbed by glass. He reached down and pulled off a jelly-like mass. Before he could react to the pain, he was jolted by the sight of his sister's flailing arms and sound of her hysterical screams. Sam quickly hauled Ann up onto his surfboard and propelled her towards the shore.

"Get this fish off me!" Ann screamed. Sam dragged his sister to the water's edge where an elderly couple had rushed to help.

Ann's left leg was almost entirely wrapped in tentacles. Tentacles were also wrapped around her right thigh, stomach and left arm. Without thought for her own safety, Ruth frantically tried ripping the stingers off but they held firm. Then Ann stopped screaming.

"It's a box jellyfish! We need some vinegar," said the elderly woman, hurrying to her campervan.

The woman returned with vinegar and paper towels. As Ruth poured vinegar over the tentacles, they released their grip on her daughter's skin. Ruth grabbed large handfuls of the jellyfish using the paper towels, but any relief was short-lived. Ann was slipping into unconsciousness.

Sam sprinted to his father who was hurrying down the beach with more paper towels. "Get the car!" he yelled. By the time Jeff returned with the vehicle, Ann's body had developed purple swollen marks where the tentacles had been and her face was drained of colour.

Shortly into the journey to meet the ambulance at the crossroads, panic set in. Ruth shouted, "She's not breathing!" As Ruth took over the wheel, Jeff held onto Ann's neck to find her pulse. He could not find it. He supported Ann's back and neck and performed cardiopulmonary resuscitation.

Near the crossroads, the paramedics from the waiting ambulance rushed to take over. Ann's face and limbs were blue, a sign she was not receiving enough oxygen. A paramedic applied an oxygen mask to ventilate his casualty. Moments later, he found a weak pulse. Soon, Ann's pulse strengthened and slowed. By the time they arrived at the hospital, Ann was showing signs of regaining consciousness.

Waves pounded on the sides of the ship relentlessly, throwing the large craft off course. My uncle regained his footing on the drenched deck and forcefully guided the ship through the tormented sea. His black hair whipped around his face and his lips were set in a hard, thin line. Around me, crates of life vests slid around the ship. I sidestepped one but lost my footing. Above, lightning arched across the stormy skies. I scrambled to my feet and spotted my cousin, Trent, twenty metres away. I quickly ran up and helped him pull a long rope, trying to steady the sails from losing control in the wind. It was like playing tug-of-war with a tall building; I firmly planted my feet on the deck and pulled with all of my strength. It was useless. We both let go, defeated. I studied my cousin's face in the blinding mist. He looked worse than me. His entire body was flushed from strain and his eyes told me that he was on the verge of fainting.

Just then, the boat lurched and dipped, threatening to turn over. A mountainous wave swelled next to the ship and was higher than the deck. The tension of foresight tightened my chest as the wave crashed down onto the deck. I was flung, powerless, from my cousin, tumbling through the churning wave. I fought to gain control but it was to no avail. When the wave receded, I found myself lying face down near my uncle, who was clinging to the wheel.

"Go!" he shouted through the howling wind.

"Wha – ?" I started to say but then saw what my uncle meant. Trent was hanging on for his dear life to the mermaid statue that was protruding out over the water from the front of the ship. It did not look like he was going to be able to hold on for much longer. I raced to the bow, slipping more than once. With no energy left, I hoisted myself up onto the mermaid statue and promised myself not to look down. I then crawled slowly towards my cousin. He was holding onto the statue, arms wrapped round her neck. I prayed I would reach him in time; everything on the wooden ship had become so slippery it was a wonder he was still with us. I moved slowly out over the water. I could not help looking down, despite my promise. Fear gripped me in a choke hold. My stomach seemed to be trying to throw itself up, stuffing itself in my throat.

Then a second tidal wave hit the craft and I lost my grip, slipping off the statue. Instinctively, I swung my arm backward for support and managed to grab the ship. Digging my fingers in the wet wood, I used the side of the boat to support myself and swung my foot over the railing. When I was safely on the deck my next thought was about Trent. There was no way he could have made it. I stared into the crashing sea and knew what I had to do. I rushed over into the emergency rescue boat. Then I took a life vest and secured it on my shoulders. However, before I could lower the boat into the waters, the force of another wave snapped the ropes suspending the rescue boat and sent the boat I was in plummeting down into the violent sea.

I soon spotted Trent a few metres away in his yellow shirt. I paddled the lifeboat furiously but the waves, which now seemed to have tripled in size, spun me off course. Blinded by fatigue, I gave one final push before I reached him. I extended one hand out to pull him toward the lifeboat, but realized I had no strength left. I barely had enough to breathe. No, I told myself, neither one of us is going to die.
