How are hurricanes named? Once identified, they are given names from a list

(16) drawn up by the US Weather Service. For many years, the hurricanes were given only female names. In 1979, (17) protests from feminists led to these violent tropical storms being given both male and female names. These names are in equal (18) proportions. Since hurricanes occur rather frequently, this list of names is re-used every few years. However, there are (19) cases where the names are not repeated.

Some hurricanes have turned out to be truly (20) horrendous such as Hugo of 1989 and Andrew of 1992. These powerful hurricanes with accompanying strong winds, flooding, tornadoes and enormous tidal waves caused much damage to man and nature.

Editing

Each of the underlined words contains either a spelling or grammatical error. Write the correct word in each of the boxes.

Last year, my father took me to his farm in Malaysia where he had spent his (39)
childhood before coming to Singapore. We were looking at durians, the King of Fruits.

(40)
The undergrowth in the plantation was thick and the creepers sneiked their way up trees

(41)
and fences. My father and I wearing rubber boots and walked around each tree. We peered carefully and with antisipeishen through the vegetation for fallen fruits. We could

(42)

(43)
not simply plucked the durians from the tree because, according to Father, they would be (44)

unripe and would never fully ripen. Get a durian to fall by bumping against a tree was no good either. Besides, a heavy thorny durian falling on one's head could cause considrabel injury. We made our way cautiously through the trees.

(46)
We kept our eyes open as we search and sniffed the air for the fruits. Durians are

(47) (48)
famous for their strong distinktiv smell. This smell is often a turn-off for those unfurrylier with it. To me, the smell are sweet and mouth-watering.

(49)

(50)
That day, we found three durians around my father's favoreit tree. We smelled them before we even saw them. My father picked one up and sniffed it. "This one should be tasty," he said, beaming.

Section I (20 marks)

Comprehension Open

Read this passage and answer Questions 71 to 80.

As Paul, an African, set off to lead a group of tourists on a kayaking trip down the river, it seemed like just another day's work. For many years, Paul, the owner of a river tour business, had been taking people on trips along the river. However, in just a few hours' time, his life would be turned not only upside down, but upside down and head-first up to his waist in a hippo's throat.

Hippos kill around 300 people a year, making them the third biggest killer of humans after mosquitoes. Their gaping mouths span four feet and are lined with fearsome teeth. On land, they can reach speeds of 30 miles per hour, but they are most dangerous in the water, where the male hippos can become territorial. Paul was well aware of the danger these creatures posed.

10

On the day of the attack, Paul was accompanied by three guides – Alex, Ben and Mike. They were all in separate kayaks and approaching the end of the tour when they came across a pod of hippos wallowing quietly in the shallow waters of the lake. Paul steered Ben and Mike away from the danger. He looked for Alex. He paused a moment so that Alex who had been lagging behind could catch up. He turned just in time to see Alex splashing into the river when his kayak capsized. Paul immediately rushed over to help him. Just as he was about to grab hold of Alex's hand, all hell broke loose.

15

A hippo bit Paul and dragged him under water. "My world went dark and strangely quiet. A few very long seconds ticked by as I tried to figure out what was going on. From my waist up, I was submerged in the river. The hippo bit my head and started swallowing me head-first down its throat. I pushed, pulled and wiggled about, but to no avail. Then, the monster loosened its grip long enough for me to escape. Bursting to the surface, I came face to face with Alex," Paul wrote in his blog.

20

Paul remembered his panic. The sight of his blood mixing with the water made him nauseous. He wondered whether he would bleed to death or drown first. Fortunately for Paul, Mike risked his own life to paddle back and help him. Paul was able to grab hold of Mike's kayak and was hauled to the shore. However, he was far from being out of danger.

25

"I made the mistake of taking a look at myself," he continued, "my left arm from the elbow up had been badly crushed. Then, a strange thing happened. I went incredibly calm and all the pain went away. I knew that this was my moment of choice. I knew right there and then that I could either drift off or choose to keep living."

30

Paul chose to live. "The choice I made brought with it more pain than I could ever have believed that I could endure. The pain was so intense that I thought for sure I was going to die before I received medical help. There were moments when I wished that I had died just to escape that excruciating agony, but I held on," he wrote.

35

Paul had to endure a gruelling eight-hour journey to the nearest hospital. In the end, his left arm had to be amputated at the elbow, but the surgeons managed to save his injured leg. Although the road to recovery was going to be a long one, Paul had miraculously survived the usually fatal attack of an adult male hippo.
