Section I: Comprehension Open-ended (20 marks)

Read this passage and answer questions 71 to 80.

Three miles to the south squatted the only village on the whole island – a sorrylooking clutch of houses on stilts with a population of about four hundred impoverished souls. The village's domestic goats and chickens were fenced up beneath the houses during the day and gathered up the vertical steps into their owners' houses at night. The villagers' staple diet was the squid which was netted from their boats daily. They feared 5 the Komodo Dragons. Only a few villagers ventured inland as nervous guides to the rare outsiders.

On my first visit, we chose the safer of two promising sites for dragon-spotting, a short walk to Loho Liang, barely a mile inland to an observational ledge overlooking a dried riverbed. Here, the reptiles could be observed from the safety above. Alternatively, 10 we could have made a four-hour long walk up to Poreng, the open land where the Dragons could be encountered at eye level, and where the offering of a sacrificial goat was even more essential for distracting their gastronomic attentions from their observers.

The Dragons were like the Angels of Death. Their mouths carried bacteria to which there was no known cure. A victim might escape an initial attack with only a slight wound 15 which within a few days would fester and stink so strongly that it was easy for the Dragons to sniff the victim down with their forked tongues and eat it.

It was long assumed that the Komodo Dragon was a scavenging carrion-eater, rather than a hunter, and that like most reptiles it was most active during the day, but inactive at night. However, studies showed that it did carry out some nocturnal activities. Some 20 thought that it could grow to only a metre long but evidence showed that it could grow to three metres long. These three myths were proven untrue by Walter Auffenberg, a scientist, who made the most comprehensive study of the creature.

Six weeks later, when the ship returned with passengers, I found myself leading a group of thirty people on the short walk to Loho Liang's dried riverbed. With us were Des 25 and Jenny who were coming along to film. We had waited some time at the observational ledge and I was beginning to worry. Finally, a large solitary Dragon arrived. It immediately uprooted our goat and disappeared behind the undergrowth with its prize. Sensing a chance to show off, I came down from the observational ledge in hot pursuit of the Dragon. I saw the wooden post and the rope which was used to tie the goat at the point 30 of vanishing beneath some bushes. I gripped the rope and was dragged helplessly along with the goat into the full-body embrace of a tree with thorns.

Every part of my body was held fast. I had only a few moments to think about the Dragon ahead before realising that barely twenty metres away behind me was an entire group of Dragons fast advancing. I debated on whether to tear myself loose from the tree 35 and leaving my skin hanging on it or to shout for help. With no time to lose, I yelled. One of the guides reached me and freed me from the thoms of the tree.

Des, in the meantime, had approached the opposite side of the undergrowth, where he had accurately located the Dragon. He fooled it into releasing the goat from its jaws and marched back to the cheering crowd, holding the goat triumphantly. His heroic pose was short-lived. Hurrying up behind him on one side was the now irritated first Dragon. On the other, the guide and my bleeding self, hotly pursued by a group of hungry Dragons. It was not a pretty sight.
