The police reported a 25% increase in shop theft in the first half of 2023. Commonly stolen items included food, alcoholic drinks, clothes, accessories and cosmetics. In response, the police have been collaborating with shop owners. Together, they came up with countermeasures such as displaying theft warning signs at strategic places where most people can see and installing high-definition cameras with facial identification software within the retail premise. With the increased use of technology, the police can now go over footages more effectively to track the shoplifters. They reassured the public that the shoplifters will be arrested sooner or later. If convicted of theft, the offender can be jailed for up to seven years and fined.

Spoken language is a complex system used for verbal communication, allowing us to express ourselves and understand the world around us. However, the immense value that languages hold is often overlooked. Let's direct our attention to the languages used locally now!

Have you heard of the Kristang language?

Kristang, also known as Malacca Portuguese, is a unique heritage language spoken by the Portuguese-Eurasian community in Singapore and the Malayan region. With an estimated fewer than 100 speakers in Singapore, Kristang is a critically endangered language. Most Singaporeans are not even aware of its existence! Therefore, the need for us to preserve this language has come into the spotlight.

Why keep a rarely used language?

Preservation of languages should be a matter of concern.

- Firstly, languages carry our cultural heritage. Traditions, knowledge, values, and historical narratives of a community, and so much more, are passed from one generation to the next predominantly by language. Each language reflects the distinctive inner workings of the community that uses it.
- Secondly, languages are closely tied to a community's identity. Without a common language, a community would struggle to exist. Language is an integral part of who a person is and gives one a sense of belonging. Without it, individuals and communities would likely experience a disconnection from their cultural heritage.

How do we approach the matter?

#1 Raise awareness of the matter

- tell those around us about the cultural significance of languages and the importance of preserving them.

#2 Learn and use heritage languages

- choose to learn our own heritage languages or even others that interest us. We can ensure the continuity of the languages by attending classes in them and attempting to use them frequently.

#3 Promote and support language education

- persuade those around us to take language classes with us. Language education paves the way for the intergenerational transmission of language and creates opportunities for us to engage with our cultural heritage.

"Our class recycling project will start next week. You can choose to do it alone or in pairs," Mr Lee, our science teacher, announced. "Your goal is to design a recycling corner that will increase recycling rates in our classroom. The best idea will be adopted schoolwide." The classroom erupted into enthusiastic chatter as students began choosing their partners and started their discussions.

Being a nature and animal lover, Lucy's interest was piqued. Momentarily, she imagined birds and fish thriving in an environment free of plastic pollution, an image inspired by hours of observing the wildlife at the lake she frequented. "The first step toward a plastic-free habitat is forming the habit of recycling," she thought. "I'm sure I can come up with a brilliant idea for the project!" Her daydreaming was interrupted by a light tap from her best friend, Max.

"Do you still have that book on recycling? I'm sure there are many helpful tips that we could use for this project. Shall we work on this together?" Max inquired expectantly.

Lucy recalled having read the library book the previous night and placing it on her bedside table. "Um..." she hesitated, "I returned it this morning ... and I'm thinking of working on this project alone."

"Oh, I see," Max mumbled and walked away with his shoulders drooped.

The next day, Lucy started working on her project. She had a unique concept for the recycling bin but struggled to construct it. The design required a standard of workmanship that was simply beyond her capability. Frustrated, she went for a walk downstairs.

At that same time, Max saw Lucy trudging along, looking downcast and sighing. He called, "Lucy?" She looked up, surprised to find Max there. He had never seen her behaving like that before. "What happened?" he asked gently. Guilt-ridden, she confessed to lying about the book and apologised sincerely. Max forgave her readily.

"You're so good at handicrafts and using tools, unlike me!" Lucy lamented.

"Well, if you need a partner, all you have to do is ask!" Max replied with a twinkle in his eye. She did so, then excitedly described her design concept of the recycling bin. "Cool! I like the idea of interactive features to inform users about environmental issues!" Max chirped.

Over the week, the pair worked tirelessly to build their recycling bin. They included sections for different types of materials and added sensors that would light up when an item was correctly sorted. A robotic voice would read out updates on the progress of the environmental efforts by various activist groups. They painted the bin with vibrant images of nature, showing a litter-free world to emphasise their message.

Lucy and Max's hard work paid off. On presentation day, their classmates were impressed with their interactive recycling bin. Instantly, Mr Lee decided to nominate their project for the annual Environmental Innovation Award. He also commended the class for their efforts and further challenged them. "Besides recycling, what else can we do for our environment?" His question unleashed a torrent of innovative ideas. As Lucy watched her classmates electing to work on an additional environmental project, she reflected, "Real change requires collective effort, and many hands make light work."

Culture is our way of life. We display culture through our values, beliefs, customs, religious practices, languages, food, clothes, architecture and even _____ we interact with each other. For example, we _____ be able to identify a group of Japanese when we observe _____ members bowing respectfully to each other in greeting, _____ bowing in Japanese culture is a sign of respect.

Countries with long histories have patterns of behaviour _____ rooted within their social group that when they have new members, these patterns of behaviour are automatically taught to them and accepted. Unfortunately, not all behaviour patterns _____ legal or civil. In some cultures, forced marriages of children occur because unwed girls may be viewed as a disgrace and a burden _____ their family. In societies that enforce _____ legal minimum age for marriage, child marriages are clearly regarded as unacceptable.

Culture evolves with globalisation, migration, and technology. As societies interact more, they exchange ideas and norms. Some societies strive to keep _____ with technology while others find it hard to balance tradition _____ modern ideas. This reflects the dynamic nature of human societies in an ever-changing world.
