On a hot summer day, a thirsty crow flew over a garden. The crow had been searching for water for hours and was getting tired and impatient. Suddenly, it spotted a jug on a table in the garden.

Excited, the crow flew down and perched on the jug's rim. It looked inside and saw some water, but the water level was very low. The crow tried to reach the water with its beak, but it could not. The jug was too deep.

The crow thought hard about what to do. It looked around the garden and saw some small pebbles on the ground. An idea struck the clever bird!

One by one, the crow picked up the pebbles with its beak and dropped them into the jug. Plop, plop, plop! With each pebble that was dropped into the jug, the water level rose a little.

The crow worked tirelessly, flying back and forth between the ground and the jug. After a long time, the water finally rose high enough for the crow to reach it.

Happily, the crow dipped its beak into the water and took a long, refreshing drink. It had solved the problem all by itself!

As the crow flew away, it swelled with pride and satisfaction. It had learned that with patience and smart thinking, even difficult problems could be solved.

Adapted from "The Thirsty Crow," a classic tale from Aesop's Fables.
